

"SLATES" UPSET BUT SURPRISES FEW IN SATURDAY'S PRIMARY

LOUISSON'S RUN MAIN FEATURE OF PRIMARY ELECTION

Hawaii Coffee-Planter Gets Vote Which is Surprise of Very Quiet Balloting

SHINGLE WELL AHEAD OF REPUBLICAN FIELD

Leads Prince Kuhio Easily; Two Democrats of Fifth District Show Up Strongly

Hawaii's second territorial primary election last Saturday passed quietly into political history with a remarkably and discredibly light vote, few surprises and in most cases with the best men nominated on each ticket to oppose each other in the November finals.

With a comparatively short ballot and a small vote, returns were made quickly, even though the count was not especially fast. By 7 o'clock the drift of the voting was apparent and by 9 most of the nominations were assured. A few were in doubt at midnight and it was not until after 10 yesterday morning that one was secured—that of Eddie Hanapi, Democratic candidate for the senate, over his fellow Democrat, Col. C. P. Laukae.

It was perhaps the quietest general election Hawaii has had since territorial government was established. Certainly it was the quietest in Honolulu since county government was established. As it was only a party primary, rivalry between two parties was absent and there were absolutely no bitter factional fights. There was no Rice-Kuhio fight such as that of two years ago, to stir partisans to fever heat and keep them alternately cheering and hooting on election night as the returns came in.

The comparatively little interest shown in the day's balloting continued throughout the evening. The Star-Bulletin's election returns drew a big crowd downtown and kept it there from 7 until 11:30 in the evening, but it was an apathetic crowd so far as getting excited about the results was concerned.

The voting ran far below that of two years ago and far below the registration, in most of the precincts. The day offered few surprises or political upsets. Plans expressed earlier in the week that some of the businessmen who were running would be fatally knifed proved fruitless. In fact, the businessmen ran notably well, showing that the "knifing" plans had been a boomerang.

As in the case of the 1914 primaries, there were few features in the individual precincts.

Honolulu's normal Republican majority was again clearly demonstrated in the general count. In almost all cases Republicans led Democrats by almost two to one, the principal exception being in the fifth district. Here two Democratic candidates for the house led the entire field in number of votes received.

Interesting points in the results are as follows:

Race For Delegate

Abe Louissou, candidate for the Republican nomination for delegate to Congress, spoiled the reputations of a lot of political prophets by polling nearly 700 votes and proving that his candidacy was far from a joke. He never had a chance to beat Kuhio, but his vote was so strong that it constitutes a real protest on behalf of voters who think Hawaii's delegate should stay "on the job" more in Washington and should be more active both there and at home in looking after the territory's interests. Louissou got 478 votes in the fourth district and 213 in the fifth. He got 25 votes in Kuhio's own precinct, the second of the fourth district. Louissou and the Democratic candidate, McCandless, got more votes on Oahu than did the confident prince.

McCandless, unopposed, polled a normal Democratic vote, showing that there was not much if any of a drift of Democrats to Louissou. While Kuhio's renomination was the principal kind of a victory, under the circumstances of Louissou's vote, the picked for a Saturday night did not indulge in any hilarity over the showing.

The popular Bob Shingle ran splendidly in the senatorial race. He led all the Republicans in votes received, getting 111 more than Kuhio. In the fourth district he led the prince by more than 200 votes and is morally certain of election in November. Sylvester P. Correa and John Lucas ran well, too, getting the nomination along with Shingle. Achi, whom many of the wise ones had picked for a Republican nomination, got a good vote in the fifth, but was badly beaten in the fourth, whereas another dangerous contender, Eben Low, ran strongly in the fourth but fell down in the fifth.

On the Democratic side the defeat of Col. Curtis P. Laukae by Eddie Hanapi and the strength shown by Manuel C. Pacheco were the features, the first being something of a surprise. Laukae led Hanapi until the very last count, when a small precinct gave Hanapi enough to nose out his rival. Pacheco polled 1613 votes, more than Correa, the lowest nominee on the Republican wing, and is recognized as a dangerous contender at the finals in November. He was strong in both

FIRST COMPLETE AND OFFICIAL PRIMARY RETURNS ON OAHU

The Star-Bulletin publishes herewith the first complete returns for the primary election last Saturday, tabulated by official authority, the county clerk's office, and finished yesterday morning. The figures show a number of important changes from those previously published and are complete in every precinct, unless a recount should be made. Of the 29 precincts, the count as given below for 26 is official and certified. The vote of three precincts, the eleventh (Waimanalo) of the fourth district, the fifth (Waialua) and the sixth (Waianae) of the fourth district, are official, but not certified, the returns having been telephoned to the county clerk's office by election officials, and the count forwarded by mail.

STAR-BULLETIN ELECTION NIGHT RETURNS ARE FEATURE OF EVENING

How News Was Rushed From Precincts; at Once Put on Illuminated Screen

Star-Bulletin election returns were the feature of election night Saturday. Except for the big crowd gathered on King street between Fort and Bethel, election night was absolutely quiet and featureless so far as the public was concerned.

The Star-Bulletin showed the only public returns of the evening, and the record for speed, accuracy and wide range covered, set in past years, was fully maintained, though there was such comparatively slight interest in the primary results that most of the screen announcement evoked not a cheer and scarcely a murmur from the crowd.

The returns were shown from the office of Thomas W. King & Co., manufacturers' agents, room 9, Waiwai building, kindly loaned for the occasion. Here part of the Star-Bulletin staff gathered to tabulate the returns telephoned in from minute to minute by other members of the staff in the various precincts.

In addition to the staff men, the Star-Bulletin was also assisted by five Boy Scouts. These alert lads, anxious to get an insight into the workings of primary elections and practical politics, volunteered to telephone in news from their home precincts, and several sections were covered in this way.

Two special telephones were installed in the Star-Bulletin's election headquarters and both were kept almost continuously busy during the evening. As fast as news came in, it was put on the big illuminated screen just across the street, and the crowd got the results to date at a glance.

Cooperating with the Star-Bulletin were the workers at Republican and Democratic headquarters, who exchanged returns, setting most in the fifth.

Representative, Fourth District. Outside of the race for delegate, probably more interest centered in the fourth district Republican representative contest than in any other scrap, because of the rumors that an attempt was being made to defeat some "haole" candidates. The attempt failed. In fact, the supporters of these men worked all the harder to assure their success.

Clarence H. Cooke, with 1502 votes, led the field and the Republican side, with Gerrit P. Wilder, Lorin Andrews, T. H. Petrie, James K. Jarrett and Charles N. Marques nominated in the order named. The strength shown by Wilder was a welcome but not altogether unexpected surprise, inasmuch as his friends got out and worked to prevent him getting dumped. The real surprise here was the victory of Jarrett.

G. F. Affonso and Andrew Bright had been expected to run better than they did. Kamanoulu was knifed by some of his fellow Hawaiians, and also the prevalent reports that the white candidates were to be dumped led many voters to go stronger for a "haole" ticket than usual.

The Democratic contest in this division was uneventful. There were only seven candidates, with six to be nominated. Former Supervisor Walter led the field with big votes in the Kakaako and Emma Square precincts, while J. W. Kelki was the unfortunate Bourbon who failed to get a nomination.

Representative, Fifth District. In this district the feature was the strength shown by Will E. Miles and David M. Kupihua, both Democrats. Both led all other candidates. Miles, who is popular with Republicans as well as Democrats, was expected to bag a big vote. He got 981 to 958 for Kupihua. Eddie K. Fernandez, running in a big field of 16, led the Republicans with 894 and is virtually sure to lead in the finals. Alfred W. Eames withdrew more than a week before the election but his name by that time was on the ballot and he got 190 votes, evidently from voters who did not know he had quit the fight, called to the coast on business.

Kupihua, who was under fire during the last session of the legislature as the central figure in a very nasty scandal, will be hard to beat in November. He was strong in both changed returns with those gathered by the newspapermen. The Star-Bulletin's organization covering the city precincts was so complete that for most of the evening the returns were shown on King street considerably before they reached either headquarters or the city clerk's office, where the official count was kept.

Every city precinct was covered by Star-Bulletin men. Country precincts, which finished their count early in most cases, were covered either by telephone or through returns sent to one of the headquarters.

In addition, many friends of the Star-Bulletin were kind enough to call up by phone and keep the paper informed of the count in several precincts.

As soon as dusk came on the first returns were put on the screen. Eddie K. Fernandez, who has handled the lantern-slide work for the Star-Bulletin very capably for many years, was again in charge of this department. He had also the pleasure of seeing his name on the screen repeatedly as the leading Republican contender for the house from the fifth district. He led throughout the evening and had no cause to worry once the returns began coming through.

Staff artist John C. Poole was represented with a large number of cartoons and caricatures of well-known figures in local politics, which served to amuse the crowd and alternate with the election returns.

About the middle of the evening the outside islands reported by wireless with returns to date. Star-Bulletin correspondents in these islands were first to send in the returns, which were on the screen immediately.

It was a fine evening and the crowd stayed late. At 11 there were several hundred still watching the figures, and it was not until the Star-Bulletin flashed "Good night!" at 11:30 that they dispersed.

The Boy Scouts who aided the Star-Bulletin were Rudolph Duncan, Jr., David Naalee, Joseph Ikoole, Carl Mortensen and "Sonny" Zane.

PRIMARY NOTES

Prince Kuhio was on the island of Hawaii last week and the story went the rounds that he wanted to make Louissou's vote as light as possible. Even at that the Big Island turned in a good number for the coffee planter. Abe's friends of the Hamakua coast stuck with him, so far as wireless returns show.

Andrew Bright, candidate for the house Republican nomination, fourth district, is said by Hawaiian politicians to have been beaten because of the similarity of his name to that of Lorin Andrews. On the printed ballot the name Andrews was just above that of "Bright, Andrew." In Hawaiian the names are even more similar. And Bright is known by nearly all Hawaiian voters of the fourth as "Andrew." He thinks that Lorin Andrews got half of his vote, because of his place on the ballot.

Much complaint was made on Saturday that duly registered voters were deprived of the right of ballot because when they went to the polls their names did not appear on the printed list sent out from the county clerk's office of voters registered in each precinct. The county clerk's office yesterday said that the fault was with the printer, who had badly "balled up" the list, leaving out many names, and returned the proof to the clerk's office too late for proper checking. Henry Van Gieson and others of the clerk's staff were busy all day Saturday trying to straighten out such errors. "Van" has a remarkable memory for those who are enrolled in the Great Register at the office and this familiarity with the voters enabled him to straighten out a number of snarls and give men their chance to vote.

The stand of timber on the two great national forests in Alaska is estimated by the forest service as over 70 billion board feet, while the annual growth will, it is said, produce of pulpwood alone enough for the manufacture of 3000 tons of woodpulp a day.
